

WORLD FAMOUS HENLEY REGATTA.

THE FINISH AT A HENLEY RACE.

Unprecedented interest attaches to this year's Henley regatta on account of the vast throngs of distinguished strangers now in England for the coronation who will, of course, avail themselves of the opportunity to witness the great British aquatic carnival, where the greatest rowing contests in the world are annually carried off. Americans will be particularly interested in this year's Henley on account of the entry of Constance S. Titus of America for the diamond sculls—the blue ribbon of the aquatic world. If Titus wins, he will have defeated the best amateur rowers in the world, and America will score another high mark in the history of sports. It is probable that royalty will be a spectator when Titus makes his great effort.

Two One-Armed Men
What becomes of the "other glove" of the one-armed man has always been a matter of speculation to the thoughtful. Two of these have been discovered recently—that of sergeant-at-arms of the senate, Major Dan Ransdell of Indiana, and that of General Hooker, the one-armed representative from Mississippi for many years in congress. Soon after Major Ransdell's arrival in Washington to assume the duties of marshal of the district under the Harrison administration, he was walking on the avenue when General Hooker approached from the other direction. The gentlemen were strangers to each other. It so transpired that the representative from Mississippi had just purchased a new pair of gloves. Being very quick to take in a situation, the General saw the strange and distinguished looking man had lost his right arm. The General was carrying his useless glove in his hand, a habit, by the way, which he has had from the time he gave up his left arm for his country. Quick as a flash General Hooker walked up to Major Ransdell and introduced himself. They shook hands cordially, the one an officer of the southern army and the other an officer of the union army. The southern gentleman said a few pleasant things (which he always has on tap), and then gracefully offered his "other glove" to Marshal Ransdell. He just as gracefully took it and the incident sealed a strong and lasting friendship. Since then these two veterans of a cruel war, who fought on opposite sides, have by mutual agreement exchanged gloves, and whenever one buys a new pair he sends, "the other one" to his friend with the other arm.—Washington Post.

Briggs—My veterinary was greatly pleased with that horse you sold me.

Griggs—What pleased him about the animal?

Briggs—Why, he discovered twelve new diseases he had never suspected before.

Glover—When my wife smells smoke at night she gets the whole house up.

Shover—That's nothing. My wife does that when she only thinks she smells smoke.
